I'd say that Anthropology at St Andrews is the department with the most passionate and intriguing academic staff and students. The breadth of the subject and the variety of material you study will surely inspire you to naturally think like an anthropologist both inside and outside the classroom.

Social Anthropology lectures give us an opportunity to hear about the adventures and experiences of our top-notch lecturers. I see them as learning through story-telling, and they inspire me to go out and discover the world for myself. Our department aims to understand humanity through our experiences and it’s a good place to cultivate one’s own curiosity about the world.

The staff are passionate about their subjects, and it shines through in their teaching. The students are empathetic and care about the world we live in. Studying Anthropology is eye-opening - it reveals fascinating facets of the world hidden in plain sight, and helps us understand ourselves in new ways.

Social Anthropology has been a great experience. It teaches you about the world and yourself at the same time, and it makes you see things slightly differently.

The teachers and fellow students are welcoming and encouraging when it comes to learning more about the way we see the world and its cultures! The university has allowed me to participate and get involved in societies such as that of the anthropology society where I have found a ground for socialising as well as getting creative with events!

Other than making me more open minded, social anthropology has made me value the things we may take for granted: language, time, colour etc. By studying social anthropology, you are constructing a new self, a more open minded, understanding and well-rounded self. At St Andrews, the staff are enthusiastic about their own research and provide you with the motivation and support needed to really enjoy your time at university.
